Leadership Myth Busting

If you were to ask the philosopher, Niccolo Machiavelli; "If it were better to be feared or to be loved?" He would have quickly responded that; "it is far safer to be feared than loved." If you posed this same question to a Manager in the 1980's, they would most definitely reflect that same sentiment. That through fear, staff would remain productive, efficient, and happy. However, in today's society we have found that it is far safer to be loved than feared.

Leslie Charles, CSP, gave us a great overview of the expectations of Leaders, not just those referred to as "Managers." By connecting the passions and culture of the business, the managers, and their coworkers, you create an environment that breeds positivity, productivity, and a staff that thrives. Fear no longer motivates employees, as we expect teamwork, kindness, and passion from those around us.

A note from Leslie:

Discovering your innate and acquired transferable skills and those of your team is an ongoing learning process that assists in delegation, promotion opportunities and team development. I advise my clients, "Don't keep your best qualities a secret; help those who report to you know their strong suits as well. This way, everyone benefits."
